PREFACE

ADM. 99

This publication has been prepared to present a historical record and a ready reference for users of statistics, librarians, etc., of the publications issued from 1840 to 1960 by the Department of Statistics and its predecessors whose function was related to that of a central statistical office. It should serve as a useful guide to the development of New Zealand since the proclamation of British Sovereignty, and should have particular value to students and research workers.

In addition this Department is preparing a 'Catalogue of Statistics' which will be a reference to current sources of official statistics in New Zealand in general.

I express my appreciation of the contribution made to the preparation of this publication by Mr G.L. Hodgkinson, Reference Officer of the Department of Statistics and for the assistance given by Mr M.W. Standish and Miss J.S. Hornabrook of the National Archives.

INTRODUCTORY

A. GENERAL

New Zealand's earliest recorded regular statistical compilations relate, naturally, to population of the first settlements, although, indeed, some statistics of output of whaling stations were collected as early as 1829. Following the Proclamation of New Zealand as a Crown Colony in 1840, statistical "Blue-books" were prepared in triplicate in the office of the Colonial Secretariat for the years 1840-1847 and 1853-1855. However, these reports were not published for general information, but were submitted in manuscript (bound), after 1841 in books with printed headings, to the Colonial Office. The material in the Blue-books included:-

1. Considerable details of Revenue and Expenditure. (General Government)
2. Local Revenue Expenditure. (A heading only, as there were practically no municipal bodies.)
3. Military Expenditure.
4. Statistics of Militia, etc.
5. Public Works. Details and Expenditure.
6. Precis of Legislation enacted during year.
7. Details of members of Executive Council, Legislative Council, Assembly, etc.
8. List of Civil Establishment with salaries, etc.
9. List of Civil Servants giving security (Guarantee).
10. Pensions. (Usually blank - as there were only occasional pensions).
11. Expenditure of Establishment - Share of Great Britain and New Zealand.
12. List of Consuls (Foreign).
13. Population and vital statistics including resident strangers, persons employed in agriculture, manufacture, and commerce.
14. Details of Churches and livings.
15. Schools, scholars, etc., with Government contributions.
16. Exchange rates.
17. Coin and paper currency in circulation.
18. Details of imports and exports (articles, quantities, countries, values).
19. Details of shipping.
20. Agriculture - principal crops, stock and produce with value of produce.
21. Prices of produce and merchandise.
22. Details of manufacturers, mines and fisheries.
23. Lands granted and sold.
24. Details of gaols and prisoners.

During the years 1848-1852 (inclusive) the Provinces of New Ulster (all the North Island above the line running from the mouth of the Patea River) and New Munster (all the remainder of New Zealand) were in existence. The Provinces of New Ulster and New Munster were constituted by the New Zealand Government Act of 1846 and Letters Patent and Royal Instructions dated 23 December 1846. They were abolished by the Constitution Act of 1852 which came into effect on 28 February 1853. Statistical reports for the whole country were temporarily discontinued but reports on identical lines were prepared for New Ulster and New Munster separately.

Provincial Governments: The Constitution Act of 1852 divided New Zealand into six Provinces whose boundaries were to be proclaimed by the Governor. These Provinces were: Auckland; New Plymouth; Wellington; Nelson; Canterbury; Otago. Each of these was provided with an elected Superintendent who, together with an elected Provincial Council, could legislate on all but a few subjects. The New Provinces Act of 1858 provided for the establishment of new provinces where sufficient demand existed. By this Act the following provinces were established: Hawke's Bay, 1 November 1858; Marlborough, 1 November 1859; Southland, 1 April 1861 - 6 October 1870; and Westland, 1 January 1874. Under this Act the name of New Plymouth was changed to Taranaki. The provinces were abolished by the Abolition of Provinces Act of 1875, No. 21 which came into effect on 31 October 1876.

All the Provincial Governments published statistics and abstracts are to be found in the Provincial Gazettes. A schedule of the Ordinances of all the Provincial Councils is printed in "Appendices to the Journals of the House of Representatives, 1882 (A-14)".

An enumeration of population in settlements was made in 1841, though it would appear that settlers, whalers, Maoris and others living in remote places were not enumerated. Annual counts of settlement populations, by direction of the resident District Magistrates, were made in successive years, and the first general census of population was made in 1851, returning a total European population of 26,707. The first actual count of Maori population was made in 1857-58, when the total Maori population was given as 56,049. First estimates of Maori population placed the population at or about the date of first European settlement at upwards of 100,000. (For the history of the census and the course of population 1769-1858 see pages 2-11 of the "General Report of the Census of New Zealand, 17 April 1921").

B. STATISTICAL REPORTS

The first statistical report, a volume entitled "Statistics of New Zealand for 1853, 1854, 1855, and 1856", was issued by the Registrar-General, compiled from official records. It contained statistics of population, migration, external trade, agriculture, public finance, postal business, and prices. After the lapse of one hundred years some features of the first official statistical report may be worth recapitulation here.

The initial statistical report is remarkable for its completeness, the meticulous accuracy and neat lay-out of tables. A most interesting appendix is a report on the "Health of the Troops Stationed in New Zealand," a carefully compiled document in which reference is made on several occasions to the healthy climate. In particular, it is recorded that the number of deaths among the troops in the year ended March 1857, was 9, the average strength during the year being 1,693. This rate is stated to be two-thirds less than what occurred among troops in Great Britain at that time; and the report goes on to state that "this low mortality was caused by the total absence of fatal febrile attacks and the small number of deaths from diseases of the lungs." Modern vital statistical records in New Zealand confirm that the enviable record in public health - noted so early in our history - has been maintained.

Statistical reports have been published regularly since the first report was issued, the scope of the information continuing to expand as the young Colony developed. By 1860 the volume had already grown to quite formidable proportions, covering the following subjects: population, vital statistics, migration, shipping, external trade, Post Office statistics, livestock, crops, Government finances, and justice and crime statistics. By 1870 new statistical series had been added relating to land sales, banking, education, and meteorology. In 1874 some statistics of local authorities (road districts) were included, followed in the next year by comprehensive figures relating to the operations of boroughs. Statistics of causes of death were first published in 1874; and, in fact, the scope of data available on statistics is remarkably comprehensive even in earlier statistical reports.

In 1873 a major change was made in form and content of the annual statistical report. Part I of the Blue-book contains lists of Governors, Premiers, Members of Parliament, and similar non-statistical information. In Part II - Population and Vital Statistics - one finds a very wide range of data, including such classification as ages at death, hospital admissions, discharges, and classification of diseases of patients. Part III - Trade and Interchange - contains statistics of trade, shipping and communications. The next part, Part IV, deals with Finance, Accumulation, and Production, and contains data on banking, Government finances, mortgages, and production (mainly farm production). Statistics of Law, Crime, and Education comprised Part V, while the appendix for 1874, and from 1875 the Miscellaneous Section, Part VI, comprised some quite comprehensive statistics of all classes of local authority. Statistics of life assurance were published for the first time in 1886; when there were 46,149 policies in force, the insurance cover totaling £13,472,000, a remarkable figure for a population (European only) of 589,000. (At the end of 1958, the total insurance cover was £901,947,975.) When statistics of friendly societies were first published in 1885 there were 21,149 members.

By 1913 the Statistical Report had grown in size to 890 pages and was issued in four separate volumes - Volume I, Blue-book, Population and Vital Statistics, Law and Crime; Volume II, Trade and Interchange; Volume III, Production, Finance, Accumulation, Postal and Telegraph; Volume IV, Education and Miscellaneous. The volumes were later bound into one complete volume for reference. The Statistical Report was issued in four volumes until 1921, when the whole plan of publication was changed. Nine individual annual statistical reports were issued in that year as follows: Population; Justice Statistics; Trade and Shipping; Agricultural and Pastoral Production; Industrial Manufactures; Insurance Statistics; Local Government; Prices, Building Societies, Bankruptcy. Each report was prefaced by an introduction in which salient features of the statistics were discussed. In 1922 statistics of building permits issued were added to the Population volume, while a detailed analysis of migration statistics was issued as a separate statistical report, an arrangement which continued until 1933, when the migration statistics were once more merged into the Population Report. Annual statistics of incomes were first published in 1922, and were included in the "Miscellaneous" statistical report. The series was temporarily discontinued following the 1931-32 tax year owing to economy reasons. The compilation was resumed in 1934-35, but following the 1941-42 tabulation was again suspended because of circumstances arising out of the Second World War until 1947, since when these statistics have been published as a separate volume.

In 1924 statistics of factory accidents were first published in the Prices and Labour Statistics Statistical Report, and this series - expanded as the years went on to cover a wider range of industrial accidents and first published as a separate report in 1943 - has continued. In 1924, too, statistics of wages and hours of labour, employment, and land tax were added to this volume. The statistical volume on Trade and Shipping became unwieldy in size, and, from 1925 to 1948, this was issued in two volumes - Volume I covering exports and imports of individual commodities by countries, while derivative tables and analyses, together with the shipping statistics, were included in Volume II. For the years 1949 to 1952 Volume I was issued in two parts - Part A covering exports and Part B imports. From 1953 these two parts have been published by the Customs Department. From 1949 material previously included in Volume II, together with other transport statistics, have been published by the Department of Statistics, as two separate reports entitled, Report on, and Analysis of, External Trade Statistics and Report on Shipping and other Transport Statistics.

The statistical reports are still issued in substantially the same form as that first adopted in 1921, with such changes as have been dictated by circumstances. In 1953 the format was changed from foolscap folio to Royal Quarto. Publication of meteorological statistics in these reports was dropped in 1928 upon commencement of publication of these data by the Meteorological Office itself. Again in 1926 the publication of statistics of local authorities as a statistical report was discontinued, and the data incorporated into the Local Authorities Handbook (formerly the Municipal Handbook). Alterations to the content of statistical reports have been made from time to time, as statistical coverage has changed. For example, during the Second World War some statistical series were curtailed owing to the press of wartime circumstances, with consequential alterations to the form and content of the annual statistical reports. Publication has since been resumed - in substantially the same form as in pre-war statistical reports.

In earlier years the statistical reports issued by the Registrar-General and the Department of Statistics contained - in addition to statistics - some items of general interest. For example, the Blue-book, the Customs Tariff, and meteorological statistics were included. Alternative vehicles of publication of such material have since been found, and the statistical reports have become purely statistical in their coverage. The detailed tables included in these statistical reports are now limited in most cases to statistics compiled in the Department of Statistics. These reports include the final figures on the particular subject with which each report deals, while detailed tables containing regional data and cross-classifications which cannot be published in other publications are included. Each statistical report is, then, the final authoritative statement on the statistical field it covers. As such it normally appears later than the first releases of basic data in the Monthly Abstract of Statistics, Pocket Digest or the Year-Book. The practice of the Department of Statistics is to release any detail required by interested inquirers as soon as the summary statistics are published in the Press releases or in the Monthly Abstract of Statistics. The Department is continually endeavouring to advance the date of publication of the complete statistical reports. As one of the means to that end, photo offset printing is now almost exclusively used in place of letterpress printing. It must be realised, however, that a considerable time-lag is inevitable between the close of a statistical period and the full publication of the final statistical report on the subject covered.

C. NEW ZEALAND OFFICIAL YEAR-BOOK

The first official publication of a Year-Book type was "The Official Handbook of New Zealand, a collection of papers by experienced colonists on the Colony as a whole and in the Several Provinces". This publication, which was printed in England and largely circulated in that country, appeared in 1875. It was edited by Julius Vogel, C.M.G. (afterwards Sir Julius Vogel), at that time Premier of the Colony. The purpose of this book differed from that of the statistical reports. Its aim was to give "a New Zealand view of New Zealand to those who may think of making in the Colony their homes or the theatres of business operations." Its well written articles, generally illustrated with woodcuts and photographs, make this volume interesting reading.

A new handbook was issued in 1883 (Pts 1 and 2 with a map) and in 1884 (Part 3) both edited by the Agent-General, Mr (later Sir Francis) Bell. The purpose of this edition was similar to that of its predecessor; but many changes were made. The following extract from the preface illustrates how rapidly the new Colony was developing.

"Upon the last editions of my predecessor's Official Handbook becoming exhausted, it became necessary to revise the work, so as to bring the information it contained into harmony with the altered circumstances of the Colony.

"So many changes, however, had taken place since 1875, that after making several attempts to prepare a revised edition, I give it up and decided to bring out an entirely new Handbook. Those changes, indeed, affected alike the political, social, and economical condition of the people. The form of government existing in 1875 has been abolished; the face of the country has been completely altered by the railways and other public works that had been constructed; the population, trade, and wealth of the Colony had greatly increased; and the aspect of each Provincial District had become entirely different from what it was.

"My wish in this Handbook has been to place in a familiar way before an intending colonist, the chief conditions under which he is to live if he resolves on making New Zealand his home."

The first "Handbook" published and printed in New Zealand appeared in 1889. In that year the Registrar-General produced a descriptive publication, "Report on the Statistics of New Zealand, 1889". This 224 page publication - beautifully printed in a clear type - contained a brief history, its discovery and early settlement, and a description of the physical features of New Zealand, followed by descriptive and interpretative comment on each of the main classes of statistics published in the Annual Statistical Report. Appendices included a diary of principal events in the history of the Colony, the Customs Tariff, and a brief article on the Thermal Springs District of New Zealand. This was followed by a similar edition in 1890.

The new venture was evidently very well received, because, in 1892, a much more ambitious publication of the same kind appeared, the "Official Handbook, 1892", also produced by the Registrar-General. This publication contained 362 pages and was set in a closer - if less attractive - type than its predecessors. In addition to the historical and descriptive material included in the 1889 and 1890 volumes, a compendious official section included a list of successive Parliaments, Premiers, Foreign Consuls, Members of both Houses, the principal Government officials, and an Ecclesiastical section. A sixty-four page commentary on official statistics followed. Articles on special subjects ranging from agriculture to mineral waters concluded the main section of the Handbook, comprising 165 pages. This section included three very interesting articles on premier shipping companies - the Union Steamship Company, the New Zealand Shipping Company, and the Shaw Savill, and Albion Company. An appendix of 62 pages dealt with lands open for selection, the Customs Tariff, postal information, and principal events. It is clear that this third volume was written largely for the information of new settlers or prospective settlers.

In 1893 the first publication entitled the "New Zealand Official Year-Book" appeared. The following extract from the preface merits repetition here.

"The Handbook published last year met with so favourable a reception that the Government decided on publishing a similar work annually, to be called the 'New Zealand Official Year-Book.' This volume will therefore be one of a series.

"As the demand for the Handbook was largely in excess of the number printed, it seemed evident that some of the special articles, after having been revised would bear repetition. But there is a large quantity of completely new matter introduced into this book, especially in the portions relating to agriculture, sheep-farming, meat-freezing, butter - and cheese-making, climate and temperature, mineral waters, thermal springs, land - and income-tax methods, &c. Of the articles dealing with these subjects, some appear for the first time while others have been re-written and enlarged."

It is perhaps appropriate to observe here that the series of Year-Books still continues and is still meeting with a "favourable reception."

The first Year-Book was divided into three parts - Part I, Introductory, Official, Statistical; Part II, Articles on Special Subjects; and Part III, Digest of the Land Laws and Description of the Land Districts in the Colony. The first part - the Official section - is an expanded version of the information included in the 1892 volume. No less than forty-two articles on special subjects are included in the second part, while the third part contains a detailed description of each land district. The Year-Book was obviously still intended very largely as a guide to intending settlers, and fulfilled this function extremely well.

The Year-Book continued in substantially the same form for several years, though there was a gradual change in emphasis until, by the turn of the century, the considerably expanded volume was aimed primarily at giving information, statistical and other, of interest and use to those concerned with administration, business, and social activities in New Zealand. The interests of intending settlers were by no means neglected, but less prominence was given to descriptive articles than in the early issues of the book. A feature of the earlier issues of the Year-Book was the inclusion of photographs mostly of a scenic nature, while a limited use was made of block diagrams and pictograms - often coloured.

A series of high grade photographs were included again from the 1955 issue depicting New Zealand scenes in 1955 and 1956, primary industries in 1957, the manufacturing industries in 1958, transport and communication in 1959, and New Zealand scenes in 1960.

Some of the special articles on non-statistical subjects in the early issues are very interesting. For example, in the 1900 issue "A Night on Mount Cook" - an extract from Green's "High Alps in New Zealand" - describes the first ascent, an exciting adventure written in superb prose. The thermal waters and springs were obviously matters of great interest - indeed wonder - in the late 90's and early years of this century, and numerous articles in early issues of the Year-Book describe the waters, their medicinal properties, facilities available, and advice to those "taking the waters". One reads with interest, "An early journey to Milford Sound," a description of gold dredging, and a trip down the Wanganui River. These lend a colour to early issues of the Year-Book lacking in the severely practical outlook of more recent issues. Of course, the alternative sources of wide dissemination of interesting descriptive articles which now exist were not available in earlier years. Again, as the range of social and economic activities in this growing country expands, it becomes increasingly difficult to include even essentials in a one-volume work. This has made it necessary to limit special articles, and to keep graphs and diagrams to a minimum.

Considerable importance was given to "Australasian" statistics in early issues of the Annual Statistical Report and the Year-Book, and one finds many tables where New Zealand and Australian statistics are compared. For example, migration statistics were especially featured, as one would expect in a period when gains from that source contributed the major portion of population increases. But these statistics were being continuously compared with Australian figures. In the 1890 publication one finds a table showing "Arrivals in New Zealand per 100 Departures for Australasia from United Kingdom," in which the figure of 13.03 per 100 is quoted for 1890.

In many other respects, too, pointed comparisons between New Zealand and Australian statistics were made in early Year-Books, reflecting, statistically, the friendly rivalry between two rapidly growing outposts of Empire. This phase has long since passed, and international comparisons have replaced Australasian comparisons in our statistical records - indicative of our greater maturity.

The promise of continuing publication given in the preface to the 1893 Year-Book was fulfilled, and the book has appeared regularly ever since. By 1913 it had grown to 988 pages and still appeared in three parts - introductory (largely official), Statistical, and Articles on Special Subjects. The 1913 issue contains for the first time a Bibliography of Works on New Zealand, a very useful feature still retained. In 1916 wartime exigencies forced a substantial cutting of the size of the volume, which, however, appeared again in all its pristine glory in 1919.

The wartime cut in the Year-Book completed a process which had been going on over the years. Early Year-Books were of a "guide book" character, as was required by the circumstances of the times. They were aimed very specifically at giving people outside the country an idea of conditions within the Colony. Again, it must be remembered also that travel within New Zealand was very difficult, and that local communities lived in considerable isolation. It was also necessary, therefore, that even for internal use the Year-Book should be something of the nature of a guide book. But as time went on more statistical series became available illustrating the progress of the Colony, and its Year-Book became - partly at least - a general work of reference. It emerged from the First World War quite frankly in this character. The original division into parts, some of them purely descriptive or of a "calendar" character, was dropped and the division into sections, which still obtains, adopted.

In 1920, owing to a severe paper shortage, the book suddenly shrunk from 968 to 414 pages, the smallest issue on record. The Government Statistician of the day remarked, in the preface to the 1920 issue, that "It was found a difficult task, in the time available, to retain with some degree of coherency all features of outstanding interest." One sympathizes with him in his dilemma; the task of condensation must have been a considerable one. It was quite remarkably well done. The next volume - a combined one covering 1921 and 1922 - was in an entirely new form, the demi-octavo size of page previously used giving way to the royal octavo, a size which is still retained. The book was entirely rearranged with thirty-six sections, many of them rewritten. Several entirely new sections were introduced, and new features included in existing sections. With the growing complexity and scope of social and economic activities, expansion of the book had been inevitable; and the economical type size (8 point on 9 point Roman face) and format, together with rigid curtailment of subject-matter to essentials, had enabled requirements to be met without the size of the volume becoming too unwieldy. A reset became necessary in 1953 and again in 1961. The new type (8 point on 9 point Times Roman) and lay-out initiated in the 1953 issue was found attractive to readers. New methods of presentation have been adopted for the 1961 Yearbook, including the elimination of down rules in the tabular material, and also a revised plan of arrangement.

The Year-Book has been aptly described as "the principal publication of the Department of Statistics and, as the title implies, the official book of general reference on the various branches of New Zealand's activities and the various aspects of her social and economic characteristics and progress." The attainment of this object involves heavy responsibilities which the Department of Statistics takes very seriously. The book has to be comprehensive, authoritative, and accurate in its facts and figures. It must include reasoned interpretative comment on the facts it presents, but not personal opinions or propaganda. It is indeed difficult to be completely objective and at the same time to avoid being dull and uninteresting. But objectivity is imperative; and dull reading, where it occurs, an unfortunate, indeed at times an inevitable, consequence of the unrelenting pursuit of that aim. The book is intended primarily as a work of reference, but, within the limits imposed by this objective, the Department endeavours to make it as interesting as possible.

D. MONTHLY ABSTRACT OF STATISTICS

Earlier statistical records were published at annual intervals, and, although some statistical data were published from time to time in newspapers, trade journals, and similar publications, there was no regular up-to-date publication of statistics. In October 1914, acting under instructions from the Minister of Internal Affairs, the Government Statistician published the first issue of a new publication, the Monthly Abstract of Statistics, described in a preface to the first issue as "a compact medium for publishing quickly, in handy form for reference, without comment or analysis, the latest statistical figures available in regard to the Dominion". A wide range of subjects was covered in the first issue - population, vital statistics, trade, shipping, railways, banking, agriculture, pensions, public revenue and expenditure, and local authority statistics. The Abstract continued in substantially the same form until July 1915, when a new feature - retail prices index numbers - was introduced, 1½ pages out of 34 pages being given to this subject. By September 1918 price data filled 25 pages out of 62, indicating the increasing importance of prices problems in the later days of the First World War.

The Abstract continued in much the same form until 1925, when a change in policy regarding the inclusion of notes and interpretative comment was brought into effect. Until that year the original statement that the figures would be presented "without comment" was fairly strictly adhered to. There was from time to time some brief comment on retail price trends, but, apart from this, very little commentary in the publication. Some of the 1925 issues, however, contain quite extensive notes on a variety of statistical subjects, and the practice of including introductory notes containing interpretative comment crystallised into a regular feature by January 1926. Since that date the Abstract has been used extensively as a medium of first publication of various annual statistical data as soon as they become available - e.g., statistics of individual factory industries, preliminary census results, etc. From January 1929 until December 1946 a comprehensive review of business statistics was a regular feature of the Abstract.

The Abstract has continued as a regular feature of the publications of the Department of Statistics over the years, covering a wider scope of topics as the statistical information becoming available has increased but keeping approximately the same size and form, 40-50 pages, royal octavo, type size, 8 point and 6 point Roman until January 1947. In that month the publication was completely recast. Certain regional information was omitted, more time series included, and the format of the publication changed to demi quarto, type size, 8 point Gill Sans Serif. In October 1947 a Graphic Supplement was introduced, and in January 1959 a one page stop press supplement was included, and these features have been continued since.

Supplements to the Abstract have been increasingly used as a means of quick publication of new statistical features or of recurring statistical results which cannot be conveniently embodied in the tabular portion of the publication - e.g., the annual Supplements on National Income; Agricultural statistics; Factory statistics; Overseas Private Investment; and quarterly supplements on Retail Trading Statistics; Manufacturers' Stocks &c. In addition special supplements have also been issued which are generally too lengthy to appear as an ordinary supplement, or because of their intrinsic merits, or infrequent appearance, are in effect somewhat different in nature from the ordinary supplement. Normally copies of these special supplements are charged for. As stated previously, statistics in annual statistical reports are final, figures published in the Abstract are subject to revision.

E. POCKET DIGEST OF STATISTICS

To meet the need for easy reference to important statistical data in compact form the Department of Statistics issued in 1927 a Pocket Compendium of Statistics, a small publication $4\frac{1}{8}$ in. by $3\frac{1}{8}$ in. size, 152 pages. This publication was withdrawn in 1932 for reasons of economy, and was reissued in a somewhat different format and size, $4\frac{3}{4}$ in. by 3 in., in 1938. In 1942, owing to war circumstances, publication was again suspended, and resumed in 1945. In 1952 the title was changed to "Pocket Digest of New Zealand Statistics". The publication is now issued annually and has increased to 328 pages. Despite its somewhat chequered career this publication is in considerable demand as a work of easy reference to the more important statistics of New Zealand. During the year 1960 plans were approved for the change in size of the forthcoming issue of the Pocket Digest to $5\frac{1}{4}$ in. by $4\frac{1}{4}$ in.

F. CENSUS REPORTS

The first regular sources of statistical data concerning New Zealand were the annual population counts made in various settlements by direction of the resident District Magistrates. These enumerations were of a census type, but were incomplete in that they related to the settlements only and did not include Maori population or settlers living in remote localities. These statistics were included in the earlier 'Blue-Books,' but, as indicated in the following quotation, their statistical value was dubious:-

The Census Abstracts, - from which a large amount of the most desirable information might have been anticipated in a shape admitting of easy arrangement - had their own peculiar difficulties, arising from such circumstances as the Census having been taken in one Province in one month of the year, in another Province in another month, and even in the same Province in different months on successive occasions; while from a want of uniformity in the Schedules, not merely as to details, but as to important branches of information, Tables which should be completed for parts of the Colony could not be completed, even approximately, for the whole. Such difficulties need not occur in future compilations, at least to any extent; the means of obviating them being evidently an annual compilation carried forward, so far as practicable, with regularity through the course of the year, and, especially, the collection of the requisite information, on a systematic plan, by Returns uniform in their arrangement for the respective Departments.

The first general census for the whole of New Zealand was taken in 1851 in November and December of that year. The enumeration was not a simultaneous one, but the coverage was complete. Upon the coming into force of the Imperial Act granting representative Government to the Colony (on 17 January 1853), six provinces were formed, the initial division into New Ulster and New Munster being dropped. Each of the six provinces passed enactments providing for the taking of population censuses, but some neglected to take a census in 1854 or 1857, although the Census Ordinance of 1851 required that population censuses be taken three times in each decade. In 1858 a new Census Act was passed providing for the triennial enumerations of population throughout the whole Colony, and censuses were taken on 29 December 1858, 16 December 1861, 1 December 1864, 19 December 1867, 27 February 1871, and 1 March 1874.

A Census Act was passed in 1877 repealing previous legislation and providing for the taking of a census in 1878, 1881, and every fifth year thereafter. The sequence of censuses in years ending in "1" and "6" was maintained until the year 1931, when the census due in that year was postponed for economy reasons. A census was taken in 1936, the one due in 1941 being postponed owing to war conditions, while a census was taken in 1945 and again in 1951 and 1956.

The range of subjects covered by the census inquiry has varied over the years. Questions covered at all census inquiries since 1851 are relationship to head of household, sex, age, marital status, industry in which engaged, birthplace, and religion. Certain questions included in earlier years have been dropped. For example, a question relating to literacy was dropped in 1926, by which time illiteracy had shrunk to negligible proportions, and a question of infirmities dropped in 1921. On the other hand, new questions have been added, such as occupation (since 1874); race - partial in 1874, and full inquiry since 1916. Various questions have been included from time to time to give information on particular subjects of current demographic interest.

The population census is the only statistical inquiry in which an approach is made to all the people, and this occasion has been made use of from time to time to obtain necessary information which could not be obtained conveniently from any other source. In the earlier days of settlement agricultural statistics and statistics of manufactories were obtained as an annexure to the population census inquiry, as was a census of religious organizations, and libraries. Latterly the population census has been used less than formerly for such purposes, but a census of poultry has been retained, the approach through the population census machinery being necessary in this case because of the widespread incidence of small backyard poultry flocks in this country.

Early reports on the population census were published in one volume but from the 1916 Census separate volumes were issued, the result of the 1956 Census, for example, being published in ten volumes and one appendix.

G. LOCAL AUTHORITIES HANDBOOK

From 1874 until 1920 statistics covering the operations of local governing authorities in New Zealand were published in the annual statistical reports. In 1903 an additional publication, the "Municipal Handbook of New Zealand," was issued by the Registrar-General. This publication contained descriptive material relating to each of the cities and boroughs in New Zealand, largely describing the facilities (e.g., drainage, water supply, fire prevention, libraries, swimming baths, &c.) available in each municipality. The names of Council members and principal officials were also included. This publication was issued biennially, continuing in substantially the same form until 1913, when information relating to harbour facilities was added.

In 1915 the content of the handbook was substantially expanded by the inclusion of a 69-page statistical section giving, in summary form, the principal statistics relating to each locality included in the book. The publication continued in the same form in 1917 and 1919, but there was no issue in 1921. In 1924 the format of the publication was changed from demi-octavo to royal octavo, and the scope of material included considerably expanded. In 1926 a major change in policy was brought into effect. A new publication, the "Local Authorities Handbook", replaced both the "Municipal Handbook" and the "Annual Statistical Report on Local Government", incorporating in one publication the material included in each of the former publications. The new publication included a comprehensive general account of the local government system in New Zealand (both historical and descriptive), a summary of the principal legislation affecting local authorities, and a section on local authority trading undertakings. This publication has appeared annually since that year.

In 1931 a substantial cut in the size of the Local Authorities Handbook was made by the omission of the detailed letterpress matter relating to each individual municipality and harbour board. In 1933 further abridgment of contents was made, the section dealing with the history of local government and description of functions being dropped. In 1956 the format was changed from royal octavo to royal quarto, the contents remaining substantially the same but the number of pages decreasing from 252 to 133. The year of publication was altered in 1937 to the financial year (1936-37), and this practice has been followed since.

COMPILATION OF STATISTICS

The earlier compilations of statistics for the Colony as a whole were the responsibility of the Registrar-General, with the exception that statistics of exports and imports were, and still are, compiled by the Customs Department. In 1910 a Government Statistician was appointed - initially an officer of the Registrar-General's Office.

In 1915 a separate Census and Statistics Office was established. The Census and Statistics Office was a branch of the Internal Affairs Department from 1915 to 1931, when it was transferred to the Department of Industries and Commerce. In 1936 the office was created an independent Government Department known as the Census and Statistics Department and directly responsible to the Minister in Charge of Census and Statistics.

The name of the Department was changed to Department of Statistics as from 1 January 1956, in accordance with the provisions of the Statistics Act 1955. This Act made a number of important changes in the law relating to the collection of statistics. The duties, powers and responsibilities of the Government Statistician were set out in general terms for the first time; provision was made for the position of Deputy Government Statistician and for the automatic assumption of the Government Statistician's duties by his Deputy in the event of his absence from duty for any reason; the classes of statistics which the Department was empowered to collect were widened and the penalty clauses strengthened. Most important of all, however, was the considerable strengthening of the secrecy clauses. The Statistics Act 1955 embodied the first real changes in the law relating to statistics since 1910 as the Census and Statistics Act 1926 merely consolidated the existing legislation and contained no major changes.

REFERENCES TO CURRENT PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS

Although the main large-scale statistical collections are centralized in the Department of Statistics, some other Government Departments maintain statistical sections or research branches which do some original statistical work, notable examples being the Departments of Customs, Labour, Health, Industries and Commerce, and the Treasury. Again a considerable volume of statistical material of general interest emerges as a by-product of the normal processes of administration - e.g., postal, savings-bank, and railway statistics. The Applied Mathematics Laboratory of the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research provides a service in the field of applied mathematical statistics.

INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION STATISTICS - (Number of Manufactories, Mines and Works at Auckland, Wellington, and Nelson 1842 to 1852 in 'Statistics of New Munster' and 'Statistics of New Ulster'. Collected in 1867, 1871, 1874, 1878, 1881 and thereafter quinquennially till 1916 in conjunction with population census: from 1918-19 the collection became an annual one and included in 'Statistics of New Zealand')

(Note - Building and Construction statistics were first collected from builders and published in this series in 1925-26 and then annually until 1940-41 when through lack of staff during the war these statistics were suspended. Re-commenced for the year 1946-47 but no results published. Again collected in 1947-48 and published in 1947-48 report. No further survey until 1952 when the year 1951-52 was covered. No further collections to date. For building figures collected from local authorities see 'Population, Migration and Buildings Report')

Statistics of Electricity generation and supply are published in the Industrial Production reports, although since 1955-56 the statistics are compiled by the New Zealand Electricity Department)
